There are two main mechanisms that nature uses to create new life forms. They are natural selection and genetic drift. The first one is where some creature (or in this case, part of a creature) has a little advantage over all others and this advantage spreads throughout the species. Eventually that gene or part of the body becomes to be the most common of its kind and lives on to reproduce. But this usually takes a really long time. It can be weeks or months. The second is natural selection where everything is equal and there are no advantages that spread throughout the species. This is the realm of genetics. In our case the
