Twenty-one patients with no history of bronchial asthma were studied for the presence of "low threshold" for physical activity in order to establish whether exercise-induced bronchospasm could be explained by a higher susceptibility to the noxious effect of physical activity. All patients were submitted to a standardised protocol of incremental and standardized exercise, the rise in plasma histamine was greater than 20% in ten patients and than 50% in three, in all cases with no history of bronchial asthma. Bronchial hyperresponsiveness was greater than 15% of the maximum response to methacholine. This study showed that physical activity induced bronchospasm can be a transient phenomenon in asymptomatic subjects with no history of bronchial asthma and that bronchial hyperresponsiveness alone cannot explain the clinical expression of exercise-induced bronchospasm.Spinocerebellar degeneration with dementia and sensory ataxia in a family. A small family in which four out of eight members, the father, mother, and their two daughters, had a slowly progressive spinocerebellar degeneration with dementia and sensory ataxia is described. Spinal cord atrophy progressed in the older individuals with a mean age of onset of 74 years. In the younger members of the family, the mean age of onset was 45 years. Neither dementing nor extrapyramidal disorders were present. This family illustrates the apparently autosomal dominant inheritance of spinocerebellar degeneration with dementia and sensory ataxia.}, N. J. Phys. [11]{}, 073046 (2009). W. Qin, Y.
