Q: Concurrent use of CompletableFuture.supplyAsync(...) and Function.apply(Object,...) Is it safe to use CompletableFuture.supplyAsync(...) and Java 8's new Function.apply(Object,...) under concurrent conditions? For example, if we have to perform operations on multiple records of a collection and all operations on the same record need to be completed before the next record is processed, is it safe to use either of these concurrent approaches? If no, why not? A: The main problem is the forEach AsyncStream.forEach(func::apply); is not thread safe. It is not possible to ensure that each function is executed in a thread-safe manner. The principle of the Single-Threaded Language model allows unsafe manipulation of shared state by executing code in a single thread. Other than that you can utilize CompletableFuture.runAsync(...) on a stream of tasks to safely execute them in parallel. You could also look at the SafeFunction and SafePredicate types, which further reduce the possibility of cross-threading exceptions. There are also other libraries available that implement thread-safe stream processing, that do offer higher level of integration with the APIs provided by the JDK. *maglev-runtime builtin_object_to_array SYNOPSIS: "Object.to_array()" DESCRIPTION: A list of Objects is converted to an array of object pairs. The list can be a subclass of Object or a set of any arbitrary objects. The 'to_array' method returns an array with elements keyed by each Object. Note: Integers are treated specially - no arrays are generated for them. $value.to_array $value.to_array([[recurrence-prefix]]) [recurrence-prefix] is a String or symbol. When String is provided, then the recurrence-prefix is appended to the keys of the array (if one exists). When a symbol is provided, an empty list will be returned. This is useful for Ruby arrays and modules, which implements to_a and to_ary.Q: Xcode and Objective-C memory usage I'm developing for iPhone using XCode 4.0.2.
