For casual observers, the hush-hush meeting last week between Russian

President Vladimir Putin and an array of American politicians and foreign policy heavyweights might have seemed like nothing more than a bilateral golfing contest. Except for one thing. Where it was held was a long way from a jackal-breeding ground. Why would these American officials, and the European diplomats and intelligence services that gathered around them, let Putin know they were so willing to engage in a secret meeting in the Great White North, on Putin's own terms? "They thought it was serious," says one former American diplomat who was at the meeting, speaking on condition of anonymity. What he'd like to know is why they would do that. It raises questions about the intentions of politicians and political strategists on both sides. And about how seriously they should take the five pages of proposed updates to the New START deal - and how seriously they should take the Russian proposals that accompanied them. The meeting took place on the day before the New START review conference was set to start in Geneva, so it's likely the American officials couldn't have been sure whether they would actually get to do the reviewing. Nevertheless, they showed up. And it's worth pointing out that Putin, in his turn, is making a show of responding to the changing relationships between the two countries. At the same time, there are a number of confounding factors that 0cc13bf012
