As dog lovers, we acknowledge our role as a crucial part of their lifeworld, and we feel called to strive to be their teachers. So this is a special issue, celebrating the lifeworld: the experiences and reflections of dog lovers in care. Dogs are a constant companion and a source of love and protection for many children; they provide unconditional, nonjudgmental, and loving care. In the US, in all major pet categories, ownership rates have recently started to increase; the effect of this is reflected in the increasing number of people who are both passionate about their pets and who are ready to adopt them.1 For more than 70 years, the Furry Planet has served as a leading source of information and a great source of comfort and inspiration for the growing number of people with dogs, cats, and other animals as cherished members of their families. Although most pet owners in the US have a pet dog, and many of these pets are very much loved and well cared for, the veterinary profession, public health agencies, and society at large often overlook—or even disdain—veterinary care for companion animals, which is often far too expensive and poorly reimbursed.1 A new study in the JAVMA Research and Education Report highlights serious limitations in current literature on working dogs. In an examination of the published veterinary literature on working dogs, it was found that the majority of studies on the training, behavior, health, and well-being of working dogs fail to utilize peer review and fail to match the scientific guidelines for study designs for data collection.
