So in the movie "If a get away with murder", the main character is brought up on multiple murder charges. He hides out at his mom's house and no one in the house is killed, therefore the lawyers can argue that his mom is the victim. Once the lawyers find this out, the cops need a way to bring him back in. The cops have the opportunity to kill the accused in front of a jury. If the accused is not convicted, the cops can point to him as evidence that he was never the type of person who would attempt to murder someone. In addition, that would further prove that since no one was hurt, that the accused would never have had a legitimate reason to murder someone. Does anyone see a flaw in this logic? Wouldn't more people trust the cops, knowing that the accused could be found guilty of a lesser crime to help convict the real killer? A: I think that if the good guy convinces the jury that the jury is a legitimate player in the game of justice, he will win in court. Sure, he's going to spend time in jail, but at least he will be alive, and that is an important thing. The problem is that I cannot see how the killer becomes a part of the new game of justice. Maybe he is found to have good motives, but that's not enough. How does the jury decide whether the accused killer is guilty of murder? They need to make a judgement about his motive. If the accused is not motivated by ill will, they cannot be certain enough of that to convict. Q: how to include a variable in a select option when submitting a form I want to include a variable in a that is created using knockout.js. When I use the exact same code for it works fine.
