It is, however, possible to add this to your iPhone app; this will allow Apple to distribute your app and reward you with the title "authorized developer" which will allow you to sell your own app. If you've made an update with iTunes Connect for your app, you should be able to add an update to the app that only requires a new version of your app. If, however, you've tried to upload a new binary that requires code changes, you'll have to submit a new app. If you update your Info.plist file with a new value under the CFBundleShortVersionString key, iTunes Connect will automatically update the app's version number during its update cycle. You do not need to open the app on iTunes Connect and manually change the version number. The new version of the app will appear as an update in the iTunes Store and you won't have to wait weeks for your app to appear on the Store. Of course, there is a slight possibility that you'll experience some delays, but if you're willing to deal with iTunes, you shouldn't have to worry about the Store as long as your app contains one or more update hooks. And if you do experience any hiccups, we recommend checking the update's logs in Xcode. A lot of times, when uploading an update, you'll receive an error message from iTunes Connect. This will be something like the following: An app binary (Version 1.0) can be uploaded successfully. Your binary is valid. Your binary is app-store-ready. Your binary is not returning any error messages on the uploader. If you receive this message and your update fails, you should check your app's version number and look at the update's files in your Xcode project. You might want to try updating the version number of your binary file before uploading and retrying. What happens if your update doesn't require code changes? If your update doesn't require new code, Apple will only update the binary's version number. No code changes are required. This means that you can still update the version number of your binary in Xcode to fix the issue. Before you make the update in iTunes Connect, you'll want to make sure you've checked your app◆ b7e8fdf5c8
