We believe that psychological research that focuses on understanding the causes of behaviorally related problems is necessary before we can effectively attempt to treat these problems. In addition, understanding human behavior will help us to develop more effective interventions and treatments. Recent advances in psychological theory and research have shown that behavior can be predicted by cognitive and behavioral processes. Research on attention, memory, and learning has demonstrated that attention and memory are not inborn processes that require no change. We can improve our brain function by developing and using strategies that promote attention and memory. The development of adequate attention and memory ability is necessary to experience education, maintain self-care, and obtain and utilize knowledge in daily life. The goal of psychotherapies is to change unwanted behavior and to improve behavior that is beneficial. The goal of psychotherapy is to change unwanted behavior and to improve beneficial behavior.
