The molecular basis of the antimycobacterial activity of nystatin: a special emphasis on the interrelationships between the polyenes and their target, and the antibiotic-induced lipid rearrangement. The three polyenes, nystatin, amphotericin B and its lipid complex, and the semisynthetic homologue amphotericin B methyl ester, appear to act by a common mode of action and the common bacterial target molecule. This hypothesis is supported by the similarity of their biophysical, pharmacokinetic, antifungal spectrum, and antibacterial and antitumour activities. The action is considered to be a consequence of the alteration of the membrane structure by binding of the cationic, polyene drug and/or complex to the anionic charge, resulting in changes in membrane fluidity, permeability, and cell growth rate. The common toxin target molecule is the membrane-stabilising enzyme, ergosterol. This is a necessary structural element in the infecting bacterial cell wall. The presence of ergosterol makes the cell less susceptible to the polyene action. Modulation of immune reactions by CCL19/CCR7-dependent increased osteopontin expression by renal proximal tubule epithelial cells. T cells are increased in bone marrow during inflammation. We investigated the possibility that chemokines and the chemokine receptor CCR7 involved in T cells trafficking contribute to the infiltration of T cells into bone marrow. T cells were found in the femurs of mice 8 weeks after tail vein injection of carrageenan (CAR). In parallel to infiltration of T cells, osteopontin (OPN) mRNA expression was up-regulated in osteoblasts and macrophages of bone marrow. To investigate the mechanisms regulating OPN expression in bone marrow, we transfected osteoblasts, macrophages, and T cells with a -1.5-kb fragment
