For example, computer technology has evolved from a cumbersome mainframe that included a handful of circuits and cables, to a relatively flexible and easy-to-use computer that is widely available and utilized in almost every field of commerce and industry, from business to entertainment. Cell phones have become prevalent and are being utilized by increasing numbers of consumers at all hours of the day and night. Furthermore, personal information managers have begun to provide the ability for consumers to store, retrieve and access numerous pieces of information such as financial information, phone numbers, addresses, appointments, letters, pictures, etc. Many manufacturers of electronic devices have recognized the lucrative opportunity to integrate and utilize such communication and electronic technologies to provide cost-effective, one-stop shopping for consumers. Therefore, the number and types of electronic products being produced and sold to the consumer market is continually increasing. With the numerous electronic products being offered for purchase by the consumer market, manufacturers are increasingly facing the challenge of becoming well acquainted with the desire and need of the consumer. One area that has not been effectively addressed by the manufacturers is the challenge of providing assistance to the consumer in assembling the various electronic devices. While manufacturers have provided printed material and promotional material with each product, the consumer is still left to assemble the various electronic components, which is a task traditionally left to consumers. Accordingly, manufacturers of electronic components are in need of a solution that allows consumers to configure, assemble, and otherwise assemble the various electronic components into an electronic device.// Copyright (C) 2019

Susanne Dröge/Polly Frankenberger Nina (11) is muttering to herself out in the street. 'I just want to see him,' she whines at a red truck which happens to pass a weak smile at her from its back window. The grin represents the last opportunity for her to stop herself. The past days have been tough, bad. Yesterday, she broke all her school glasses, the ones she's worn through six years. The day before, she ran out to the woods and stayed there for hours, 'The forest always helped me', she says. She tried to eat, to sleep, she didn't want to have to go home. 'I didn't want to at first', she confesses now. She smiles. She's smoking a cigarette and watching her friends in the river as they's play. She tells us how she and her mum struggle to make ends meet. How can she remember which articles her mum wore on her back when she worked at the PPG? The cold? The damp? The beautiful, warm sunshine, their good times? 'Not all, just the funny ones.' How can she remember clothes like capes, leggings, coats? 'My mum made a costume for my Carnival. I wore a leotard with a tiny blouse under my mum's coat. I called it a cape, but it was her blouse. It still hangs in the wardrobe.' Nina's tears well up, she had a great clear memory. 'This isn't the end of the story. It's not all sunshine and rainbows. A mother's work is never done. I want to ask if they were also worried about their daughter during those days', said Nina's teacher Christine, when we met Nina the day before. Christine tried to make the pupils feel calm. Nina is part of the exhibition The Littlest Troubles, a project from Argentina, about 24 girls who are all victims of separation,

LAND Set Review: After launching Farming Simulator 15, a stunning eye-candy explosion which seemed promising enough, right from the beginning I was wondering how in the world such a graphics engine would fit on an agricultural machine. Not only the impression I gathered when I played Farming Simulator 14, but also many of the screenshots of Farming Simulator 15 during its presentation seemed to imply a couple of things: a lot of things happened at the same time, even if seemingly well planned and in a sensible order in real time. My sure gut feeling was confirmed when on the first day I grabbed a single player save file to test it out. The game crashed immediately. I rushed to the FARMPAC forums, where they recommended loading a different game. I tried that with no success. Now, I had the impression that something bad had happened. The only fix was to wait for the creators to solve the issue. The only thing I was noticing on the server forums was that the engine appeared to work fine, just not on the same PC as me. This was an anxious state of mind. A couple of weeks later, the game officially entered beta. I tested this, got it working and immediately made a long post on the FARMPAC forums asking if they would consider a Steam CIB version. I didn't get an answer, but the fact that since the registration "beta" I've received nothing but positive feedback (The simulator seems very stable and the game runs so well that the amount of time I spend on fixing bugs is also unneeded) was a great relief. Luckily enough they did answer, and they also stated they were considering a Steam CIB version. From the beginning, the entire SimCity engine has become a work in progress. While the rendering done is surprisingly decent, I've tried to set bugs, sometimes I managed to fix them, sometimes I didn't. For example, I managed to solve a critical bug issue, I think it was in the audio engine of the game, which was extremely important for the game, because it seemed like all music was supposed to play at the same time it was being produced. When an event would happen, like rain, new plants to grow, rain, a storm, planting, eating, marketing, the sound effect of the events are supposed to have a rise and a descent in volume. Now, I started to notice that the simulator would trigger the sound event for all crops but would never, ever, trigger the rain event, even if it was raining very

Despite recent strides towards a better understanding of biological systems from the viewpoint of the molecules and cellular dynamics, a general and quantitative molecular dynamics (MD) method applicable to a large number of biological problems continues to be lacking. Such a method provides an indispensable bridge between biological insights and a more rational view of complex systems such as those underlying biological processes. Thus, only when a detailed and dynamic insight into the system of interest is established with a biological understanding can a rational view of the system be produced. Therefore, a MD method which combines the most recent developments is necessary. In this task, a large scale computer, for example, IBM's NS/2 or APOLLO are indispensable. With the remarkable advances of computer hardware in the recent years, mainframe computers of this type made in the past are not sufficient for attaining the target of achieving the desired resolution range. To make up for this deficiency, recent years have also seen a remarkable improvement in the increased operating speed and reduced cost of LSI processors such as DEC's Alpha, supplied as replacements for the old and out of date computer systems. In the field of simulation, such algorithms have been proposed
