This invention relates to a glass bonding method, and more particularly to a method for producing a laminated glass bonding layer which is to be formed between a surface of the first glass plate of a first automobile or other vehicle and a window glass plate of a second automobile, each bonded by way of a thermoplastic resin. There has been a strong demand for an automobile window glass plate having higher safety in an automobile accident or the like. In order to meet such a demand, automobile window glass plates are bonded together through a bonding layer. In the case of bonding the automobile window glass plates of a door of an automobile or of a window glass plate of a side door of an automobile, the window glass plate to be reinforced is bonded to the automobile window glass plate, for example, of the door of the automobile, through a bonding layer of approximately 5 mm in thickness. The bonding layer of approximately 5 mm in thickness has, for example, a double structure in which two layers of approximately 5 mm each are integrally bonded to the window glass plate through an adhesive having a low elastic modulus in the plane direction of the window glass plate. The bonding layer has the double structure for the purpose of more securely bonding the window glass plate to the automobile window glass plate. As methods for producing a bonding layer of approximately 5 mm in thickness, there are known, for example, the use of an adhesive agent comprising an adhesive composition, and a glass bonding method using a liquid phase sintering technique (see JP-A-5-135861). The known bonding layer made of an adhesive composition, however, has a problem in that it cannot sufficiently meet the demand for an automobile window glass plate reinforced by way of a bonding layer having higher safety in an automobile accident or the like. More specifically, it is very important to improve the bonding strength of a bonding layer in order to improve the safety in an automobile accident or the like. In the case of the conventional adhesive composition, the bonding strength
