When the ceiling was lifted, under political pressure, in April of 2011, by a Republican House and Democrat Senate, the act itself did not breach the ceiling. In truth, it didn't actually raise the ceiling, but it did essentially tell the Fed that it could follow through on its threat to reduce the flow of funds to the Treasury, ending their ability to cover interest on the debt. That's why it was called "the first debt ceiling breach in history." But it wasn't. That's not what the "debt ceiling" means, and that's what matters. We are being treated to a series of headline events that get us closer to the day when the ceiling is breached and the Treasury cannot pay all of its bills, effectively defaulting. This is all an attempt by the politicians to get their friends, the biggest beneficiaries of our debt, to vote for them again. The idea that the "debt ceiling" is a political problem and not an economic one should be obvious. The only reason we're in this situation is because the national government, and all governments in the developed world, have been spending far more than they're raising in revenue. The real problem isn't the ceiling, it's the fact that we have borrowed money that we cannot pay back.
