I first use a dry vessel for mashing and then a wet, then I move the beer to the carboy. What is a safe way to store the carboy? Will you use another vessel? Or let the carboy ferment in an environment with other beer? A: First thing is to make sure you give enough time for fermentation. A lot of people do not do this. Secondly you should ferment in a closed system. Make sure the carboy is completely sealed and does not have any openings. Then, just make sure you are not putting any carbonated foods into it. You should be ok. Some people will put it in another vessel. Just remember that you will need to watch the temperature carefully. Try to not put it into a chiller, or even a room with a heater. If you are going to put it into a beer fridge or even an icebox you might need to pull it out and then put it in the fridge for a few hours.
