'Bully' and 'Horrible Bosses' Despite being one of the most commercially successful movies of all time, "Grown Ups 2" could be the nicest movie in theaters this week. I don't mean that as an insult, but more as a compliment. Even before it was released, "Grown Ups 2" got panned and the jokes started flying on Twitter. And then it was out, and all of those critics were wrong. This sequel is a gooey, warm-hearted comedy with enough laughs, drama and audience appeal to play at any theater in the country. Dan Levy and John Cena have no business being in a comedy, but the "Superbad" pair kick it right into high gear. They play Nick and Adam, two slacker adults trying to take a trip to Vegas with their college buddies to celebrate the 40th anniversary of their 20th high school reunion. In one of the many changes to the original, Nick and Adam don't just follow their friends, but two girlfriends, Mercedes (Rebel Wilson) and Michelle (Rose Byrne). From the moment the film opens, they are unlovable idiots, but Levy and Cena quickly warm their audience's hearts. Wilson and Byrne play off each other well, and the two rom-coms take a back seat as the guys enter a series of scenes that are hilariously corny and outside their comfort zone, from full-frontal nudity and blood bath, to shots of their legs. There are few adult comedies that can boast laughs and drama. The characters in "Grown Ups 2" have enough heart and charm

Q: How to derive MySQL tables with fluent mappers' EntityFramework queries? So, I've got a terrible culture going on here at work. We're struggling to come up with how to best architect our database structure. I got bitten by the so called "ActiveRecord anti-pattern", i.e. using database objects directly (over multiple layers of abstraction). So, lets take an example of a store's entity (called Store): Store has Address, City, Country, ZipCode; Address has Country, City, Street, ZipCode Country has State, City, Locality Locality has Area Area has Town Town has Street Street has Number Number has NumberRange NumberRange has Start and Stop etc. All views have address (from the address entity), however only the "show" view (getting an id along with access to the entity itself) actually has address (and country and city) entities. Point here is that I can't figure out a proper way to inform the foreign key (address, city...) to the other tables without never actually casting the entity itself (I get the mapping already from entity set mapping). What would be the way to have association via address objects, without actually casting to a Magento object. Currently, I'm trying to ask: How can I make an query that would fetch me the country, city, state and locality (which is in a similar fashion Map Types have the important distinction of holding empty strings only). If I make some magic dynamic query, it works. But I feel that there could be found, already built, a way to make this standard, "proper" way of structuring database tables and mapping classes (or mappers) for those tables
