Well, we know you have questions. How does Trump learn of the devastating policy shifts happening in his administration? It's the same way he learned about the riots in Charlottesville: word-of-mouth. His close circle of advisers — the people he relies on for steady counsel — have the ear of the president. So, how do they get that information? According to a recent article by Scott Greenberg and Azim Khamisa, Trump supporters often get their news from Trump supporters. A study by the American National Elections Studies found that Trump supporters tend to have higher levels of "political sophistication" than other conservative voters. Here's how it breaks down: Photo: Pete Souza/Image 6 from Azim Khamisa. That means that if you're a Trump supporter, the people who know you best are inclined to know you as well. This is a fact that is central to understanding a lot of the behavior on the far right. Groupishness is a friend. Therefore, the best tactics to get Trump's attention and hold it are also insular and groupish. So, for example, the Trump sympathizer sees a picture of an eight-year-old girl, crying and on the brink of death, and the only way to get his attention is to flood his account with tweets saying that it's a hoax. He says racist things about Mexicans and Muslims, and since everyone in his orbit sees him that way — his family, his network of friends, his political allies — they reinforce his worst instincts. That's why Trump has devoted himself to a manic Twitter feed. He knows, and the people around him know, that he's going to get attention that way. It's a war of attrition, and we're winning. Trump knows that, and he also knows that every day he tweets is a day his opponents are not making it about racism. They're not talking about his comments about Mexicans and Muslims. They're not talking about what his administration has said about the violence 804945ef61

This works great with react-native, as every react-native project is a react-native application by default, just like it was react-native-specific. However, I am working on a proof-of-concept to use react native with wpf, specifically with windows forms. I'm using react-native-windows, and would like to be able to run react-native from its cmd on a folder with windows forms. I've tried various options with the react
